Video transcript

Generate a resume using social network tools

Let's explore how to use your professional social network profile to generate a resume, also known as a curriculum vitae if you live in a country other than North America. If you've already perfected your profile on a platform like LinkedIn, you're just a few clicks away from turning it into a polished resume.

Let's walk through how to generate resumes on three professional networking sites: LinkedIn, Indeed, and Europass.

First up is LinkedIn, one of the most popular platforms in this category.

LinkedIn has a feature that allows you to save your profile as a PDF resume.

This feature pulls all the information from your profile, such as experience, skills and education, and formats it into a clean professional resume.

To begin, go to your LinkedIn profile and find the more button located near your profile picture and headline. When you select it, you'll see a save to PDF option. Select this option and LinkedIn will instantly generate a PDF version of your profile that you can download.

And that's it. A quick and easy way to create a resume using the information in your professional social network profile without starting from scratch.

The second platform Indeed also offers a similar feature. With Indeed you can create a profile that functions like an online resume, which you can convert into a professionally formatted resume.

After setting up an Indeed profile with all your relevant information, you can simply download it as a PDF resume directly from the site.

You might find Indeed particularly useful if you're applying to jobs listed on Indeed, so you can quickly share your resume with companies.

The third platform, Europass, is a widely used service in, you guessed it, Europe, which let's you build a detailed profile including your education, work experience and skills. Europass also enables you to create a CV from your profile in multiple formats, and even offers templates to further customize your CV.

However, creating your resume using social networking tools does not mean your work is finished.

While generating a resume from your social network profile is a great starting point, you must review the final document to ensure it accurately represents your experience and skills. You should also customize it if necessary for job specific applications.

Using social network tools such as LinkedIn, Indeed and Europass to generate a resume is a quick and efficient way to leverage the work you've already done on your profile. It saves time and creates consistency between your online presence and job applications.

So go ahead and try it out. Use the tools available. Generate your resume and get one step closer to landing that next opportunity. Good luck!